Traumatic brain injury (TBI) is one of the leading causes of death in young adults. The incidence of TBI has been increasing over the past two decades. The long-term consequences of TBI include a range of motor, cognitive, and emotional changes. The cognitive and emotional changes caused by TBI most often result from structural and functional changes in prefrontal cortex (PFC). However, there is considerable overlap between the functions of the PFC and the other major integrative structure of the brain, the striatum, suggesting that both structures may be involved in the mediation of the cognitive and emotional consequences of TBI. The purposes of this project are to examine brain regions thought to mediate the cognitive and emotional consequences of TBI in conjunction with the temporal course of recovery to determine which regions are important and whether changes in these regions can predict later clinical symptoms. The study of brain mechanisms by which TBI affects the PFC, hippocampus, and striatum is important to public health because new treatments for TBI have been developed that target these brain regions. This project will use functional magnetic resonance imaging (fMRI) to study activity during a set of cognitive and emotional tasks in young adults that were injured in a TBI study. At baseline, prior to TBI, and at three, six, and 12 months post-injury, participants complete all tasks twice while in the scanner. During fMRI, subjects perform one of two visual spatial tasks (counting or measuring), one of three verbal-episodic memory tasks (episodic short story recall, repetition of the Stroop interference task, or semantic classification of pictures), and one of three emotional tasks (unpleasant pictures, pleasant pictures, or faces expressing anger and fear). The project
